“ I may not have gotten to spend my whole life with my father, but that's ok. The relationship we built over these past few years was as good a one as I could've hoped for. And though we didn't have a lot of time together, the way everyone who knew him, loved him, tells me what kind of man he truly was. There were times that it almost startled me at how alike we were. So many of the same mannerisms, our sense of humor, our walk, our laugh, even the way we sat in chairs; it really was almost comical. The last time he came to visit, we all sat at the kitchen table where he taught my husband and me how to play Phase 10, and we played...for hours! That is one of the things I loved most about him. He was perfectly content to just hang around with us doing nothing in particular. He was always so easygoing, so unassuming. Life is hectic and, as everyone says when it's too late, I thought that someday when things slowed down, we would get to go visit and see him in his life. The morning we got the call to tell us he had passed, we were preparing to head to Oklahoma later that afternoon. I had asked my uncle not to tell him we were coming, to let it be a surprise. We missed him by only a day. As much as that hurts my heart, I can see him with that smile, kinda shaking his head, and laughingly say, "That's okay!", like whatever it was that I was worried about was no big deal at all. Unfortunatley, an illness is keeping us from being there in time for his services, but that doesn't mean that our hearts are not broken or that our thoughts are not with him. I hope many of you will share memories of him here, so that eveyone will know how very much he was loved.

"Always have, always will."
